SECTION C: READING COMPREHENSION (10 marks)

Read the following passage carefully and answer the questions that follow. Use correct English sentences and, as far as possible, your own words.

The information in a person's computer is private, and normally it is a crime for anyone to find a way of seeing this information when they have no right to do so. People who have committed the crime of hacking or finding a way of seeing the data in other people's computers have been sent to prison for as long as six months. However, Paul Redworth, aged 19, did not intend to commit a crime when he illegally gained access to other people's computers. In the opinion of the court, Paul was an addict who could not stop what he was doing.

Paul was given his own computer when he was 11 and started by playing computer games. But he soon became bored with this and quickly learned to write his own programs; that is, give the computer instructions to do certain things. By the age of 14 he was able to gain access to other people's computers, starting with ones belonging to a travel organization. Quickly moving on to bigger and more powerful machines, he was even able to see the secret details of people's illnesses by reading health records on computers.

His computer was the only thing that mattered to Paul so he would stay up nearly all night, sitting at it in a darkened room hour after hour, night after night, hardly eating or sleeping. His physical and social life suffered, but Paul's skills with computers had no limits. He was very intelligent and the reason for his hacking was because it was an intellectual challenge. Computer owners try to keep their information private by using what are called security systems, which simply means ways of protecting their information. Paul's aim was to use his brain to find a way of defeating these systems.

Before he could get into a computer, he had to discover its secret password. But he was not contented just to read the information he found, he would add his own messages.

How was Paul able to reach computers all over the world from his mother's house? He made a piece of equipment which linked his computer with others through the telephone line. This piece of electronic equipment is called a modem. The first computer he hacked was at the university near his home. It was one of a network of computers linking universities all over the country. His mother became very worried of his behaviour, so she switched off the electricity supply in their house. But, whenever she did this, he would become very aggressive and turn it on again.

Fortunately, Paul obtained a place at university to study computing. He finds the work there very challenging, so he no longer feels the need to hack other computers and has stopped breaking the law.
