THE NEGATIVE IMPACT OF TECHNOLOGY ON TEENS

Every day the average teenager spends up to eight hours on electronic devices, which adds up to 56 hours in a week. New phones, computers and other electronic devices are constantly being released, with updates being added to even previous week's releases. Teens are obsessed with having the latest and best phones, computers and iPods. Since teens are using technological devices daily, they're isolating themselves from family and friends - while limiting their communication skills.

Teens are becoming addicted to technology, which makes them withdraw from the real world. They largely communicate through texting, online chatting and Facebook. Teens have stopped picking up the phone to call friends and family members. Without verbal communication skills, what will happen to future generations? Not only are cell phones and computers negatively affecting teens, which means they communicate less with others. When someone is wearing headphones it's hard to get a good conversation going.

Teens argue that cell phones allow them to contact family and friends quickly and easily, but they're becoming glued to their phones. Studies show that 75% of teens own a cell phone and 87% of them send and receive text messages every day. Teens constantly receive messages and text back. Whether it's at a family dinner or at a movie, they just can't put their phones down! Even in school, teens are texting during classes rather than listening to the teacher's lesson.

Apart from teens not paying attention during classes, they're also using text language in their writing assignments. About 38% of teens say that they've used text shortcuts in schoolwork. Abbreviations and slang created for texting don't follow proper English grammar rules. Since teens are constantly texting, they subconsciously use this language in schoolwork, thus limiting their vocabulary and their written communication skills.
