The internet and Job opportunities.

Useful as the internet is in a job search it's only one component of a complete job-searching strategy which includes other main activities. Follow these tips, and you'll be putting together a multi-level job search that utilizes all the resources at your disposal. Keep in mind, until you have found a job, looking for a job is your full-time job-so treat it as seriously as you would any major assignment, and you will start to notice results over time, even if it takes a few months of concentrated effort on your part.

Put out the word that you are in the market for a new job. Do not be angry with yourself. Of course, but do not be shy mentioning it in conversations with friends, family members, Former colleagues and classmates, and anyone else you happen to meet. You never know where the next opportunity might come from. Consider joining a professional association, as well as a job search support group- even if they do not directly connect you with job opportunities, they will help to guide you in your search. If you do not already have a profile on LinkedIn. Com set one up and joins some discussion related to your field. Seek out discussion groups on other social-networking sites like Facebook and Google plus, while you are at it. Every conversation is an opportunity to learn something useful for your research.

Potential employers come in every size, from local small businesses to multinational corporations and almost all of them have at least a basic website. Jump on Google and search for terms related to businesses in your geographic region and your area of interest, for example, "bakeries in Douala" and post and telecommunications related businesses around you. Explore these companies' websites to find out how their application processes work. If you cannot find information on a given campaign's website, contact them yourself and ask. And for more ideas, use the employer locator from career one stop to create a list of target employers; you can search by industry, occupation, or location to create your list of possibilities.

Think of your resume (curriculum vitae) as a marketing brochure for yourself and your work. It says: "I worked here, and while I was there I did this to benefit my employer" implying that you can also benefit any potential employer with whom you share it. And while it's a good idea to make your resume available for viewing on one or two major job search sites, as well as one or two sites related to your industry in particular, use caution when deciding how freely to share your contact information, and how widely to distribute your resume. Some resume distribution services (also known as "resume- blasting" service) offer to send your resume out to thousands of companies in return for a fee.

An effective job search make use of networking contacts, face-to-face conversations discussing groups and every other source formation you can find. The internet is a very powerful toll for job- searching, but many people frustration with online job searches result from over-reliance on career search engines. Spend the other half networking face to face, cold-calling companies that interest your, and talking through your job-search problems with people who want to help you.
