people who live in different locations work on obtaining a new skill or knowledge set. In a traditional, in-person classroom setting, the cost of the space, infrastructure, maintenance and materials adds up. Most of these costs go away when learners are online. Web-based training and e-learning enable flexibility, letting learners consume information at their own pace. Online cohort learning is based on three pillars: learning, reflection and action. Critics point out the following disadvantages related to e-learning:

Need for human contact. Web-based training is a good alternative for independent, self-motivated students, but the need for human contact limits its usefulness for students with other learning styles. For example, a learner using an asynchronous e-learning method might not be able to successfully complete an e-learning course without the structure of a deadline. They might also need instant responses to questions that an asynchronous system doesn't provide.

Technical issues. Students connecting virtually often must use their own devices to attend online classes and complete assignments. Connecting and staying connected requires the right devices and network access that all students might not have.

Lack of transparency. Sometimes the quality and credibility of the content or the teacher isn't always clear and transparent on every e-learning platform. This is especially an issue on free and easily accessible resources.
