EVALUATION OF COMPETENCES

Read the following text carefully and answer the questions below.
Use good English as far as possible your own words.

Jay Tee, 30, has been a drug addict since he was a teenager. He has tried to kick the habit many times, going in and out of rehabilitation centers. He managed to stay sober for a month before suffering a relapse. There are many drug addicts like Jay Tee. Why do they end up in this situation? It doesn't matter if you are white, black, Asian, or Latin—every race has its share of drug abuse problems.

Some people say that it is due to the perception of drugs as “bad and illegal” and therefore something so irresistible that you just have to try it. Teenagers, in particular, are curious to discover this “forbidden fruit.” Some manage to kick the habit early, but many others remain trapped.

For many teenagers, drug abuse is a form of escape. They use drugs to get out of their misery, pain, confusion, and loneliness. Some teenage drug addicts grow up without parental guidance, leading them to resort to drugs. Others are physically or mentally abused, and drugs become the only thing they can rely on. Many succumb to addiction because they want to feel like they belong. They try drugs to please their friends or to be part of a group.

Many teenage drug abusers are low achievers in school and have low self-esteem. Some claim they were first exposed to drugs at parties and discos, where they were distributed freely at first, leading them to come back for more.

As a result, many became addicted before they even realized it. In certain cases, these teenagers may resort to committing crimes to support their expensive habit.

One effective tool in the fight against teen drug abuse is communication. Troubled teens need an outlet to express the problems or depression they are facing. Parents should take time out from their busy schedules to spend time with their children and listen to their problems. Communication, however, should go beyond words. Parents should show their children that they genuinely care. Adequate parental supervision has also been found to deter drug use in youth. Parents should know who their children's friends are and what is going on in their social lives. School counselors should also play an active role in providing information on drug abuse and offering emotional support.

One common belief is that drug abusers should be able to stop taking drugs if they are willing to change their behavior. However, drug addiction is a disease that affects the brain. Because of this, stopping drug abuse is not simply a matter of willpower. Drug abuse can affect a person's self-control and ability to make sound decisions, while also sending intense impulses to take drugs. Through scientific advances, we now know that the abuse of drugs leads to changes in the brain's structure and function. At the same time, we also know that drug addiction can be successfully treated, helping people overcome their addiction and resume productive lives.

At the end of the day, the best way to prevent drug addiction is by educating teenagers about it. The more they learn about its harmful effects, the fewer excuses they will have to try it. This may even dissuade them from using drugs altogether.
