What Are Human Rights?

Human rights are defined in the Encyclopedia Britannica as "rights thought to belong to the individual under natural law as a consequence of his being human." In other words, every one of us has a right to expect certain standards and freedoms for no other reason than that we were born human.

Why people should possess these rights has often been argued. Some feel it is just because of tradition. Others maintain it is a part of "nature," part of the "humanness" of man. At least one philosopher held that human, or natural, rights are a consequence of God's commands. For example, God commands man not to murder his neighbor. Hence, all men have a human right to expect not to be murdered.

One of the most comprehensive descriptions of what are viewed as human rights is found in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations in 1948. After mentioning that all men have the right to life, liberty and security of person, it goes on to specify such things as freedom from slavery, torture and degrading punishment; equality before the law; protection from interference with a person's privacy; freedom of thought, conscience and religion; and the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of a man and his family. These are only some of the rights proclaimed in that document.
