WHAT FUTURE FOR GRADUATES

After four or more years of college, you may think that you are prepared for the business world. After all, you studied a subject in depth and obtained a degree designed to train you in a certain career area, so you should be ready for the job market –right? While a new graduate's knowledge of his or her subject area may be extensive, there are a few points to consider before sending out those first tentative resumes.

One important fact to know is that, for most employers, a degree from a good college is just the beginning. Job experience is heavily weighted in the decision of which candidate to hire, and that is something that most recent graduates unfortunately lack. Making an excellent first impression is even more important for a first-time applicant, and showing knowledge of good business etiquette can help bridge the gap between you and a candidate with a few more years of experience.

When writing the cover letter of your resume, think of what you have actually done that relates to the job for which you are applying. Internships can be very helpful in this regard. Also, make sure that you are applying for a position that is appropriate for someone seeking their first post-college job.

If you are really interested in working for a certain company, but are informed that the position for which you applied isn't a good fit with your background and experience, don't be afraid to inquire politely about other positions in the company that may not have advertised yet. Develop a good relationship with the hiring director, and even if a position is not available when you first apply, you can check back periodically to find out if the situation has changed (or they may even contact you) .

Once you have been called for an interview, plan your strategy carefully, from the outfit you wear to anticipating the questions that the interviewer will ask. Regardless of how casual the company's employees may dress, an interviewee should always dress more conservatively. Men should wear a suit with a classy tie (no novelty ties, at least until you get the job) and women should wear either a suit or a nice blouse and skirt or slacks.
